

Loyal Allies or Stubborn Establishment? Congress, the GOP, and Trump’s “America First” Doctrine

Florian Böller

Received: 28 February 2023 / Revised: 13 April 2023 / Accepted: 27 April 2023 / Published online: 24 May 2023
© The Author(s) 2023

Abstract To what extent was U.S. President Donald J. Trump’s populist foreign policy agenda supported by the Republican Party (GOP) in Congress? A burgeoning literature on Congress and U.S. foreign policy has identified increasing partisan disagreement on international issues. Trump’s “America First” policy may have further incited division and ideological controversies. At the same time, the 45th U.S. president’s foreign and security policies were, to a large degree, at odds with traditional GOP policy positions. To understand executive–legislative relations on foreign and security policy during the Trump administration, and in particular the role of the GOP, this paper first investigates voting records in Congress during the Obama and Trump presidencies. The analysis reveals that the reaction to Trump’s “America First” doctrine was not uniform and that parts of the GOP asserted themselves against the president. To explain the sources of this variance, the article focuses on two policy areas with varied GOP positioning: arms control (pro Trump) and foreign aid (contra Trump). In sum, the analysis reveals that some Republicans with traditionalist views (the so-called GOP establishment) opposed some of Trump’s anti-internationalist policies, in particular those that contradicted long-standing GOP preferences regarding vital U.S. security interests. At the same time, Republicans supported Trump on issues where the GOP could continue its policy preference, on arms control in particular.

Keywords Polarization · Foreign policy · Arms control · Foreign aid · Republican Party

✉ Florian Böller
Faculty of Social Sciences, Rheinland-Pfälzische Technische Universität Kaiserslautern-Landau,
Erwin-Schroedinger-Straße, Postbox 3049, 67653 Kaiserslautern, Germany
E-Mail: boeller@rptu.de

Loyale Alliierte oder stures Establishment?

Der US-Kongress, die Republikanische Partei und Trumps „America-First“-Doktrin

Zusammenfassung Inwieweit wurde US-Präsident Donald J. Trumps populistische Außenpolitikagenda von Mitgliedern der Republikanischen Partei im Kongress unterstützt? Neuere Studien zur US-Außenpolitik haben eine zunehmende Polarisierung außen- und sicherheitspolitischer Themen im Kongress identifiziert. Daher liegt die Vermutung nahe, dass Trumps „America-First“-Doktrin den Streit zwischen beiden Parteien weiter angeheizt und ideologische Auseinandersetzungen verschärft hat. Gleichzeitig stand Trumps Außen- und Sicherheitspolitik im Widerspruch zu traditionellen Positionen des Republikanischen Establishments. Vor diesem Hintergrund untersucht der vorliegende Artikel empirisch das exekutiv-legislative Verhältnis im Bereich der Außen- und Sicherheitspolitik während der Trump-Administration, und hier insbesondere die Rolle der GOP. Zunächst werden dazu relevante Abstimmungsentscheidungen im Kongress analysiert – auch im Vergleich zur Obama-Präsidentschaft. Es zeigt sich, dass die Reaktion der GOP auf Trumps „America-First“-Politik uneinheitlich war und dass sich Teile der Republikanischen Partei Trump widersetzen. Um diese Varianz im Verhalten der GOP zu ergründen, werden in einer vergleichenden Fallstudie zwei Politikfelder mit unterschiedlicher GOP-Positionierung genauer diskutiert: einerseits die Rüstungskontroll- und Abrüstungspolitik (pro Trump) und andererseits der Bereich der Entwicklungshilfe (contra Trump). Insgesamt verdeutlicht die Untersuchung, dass Mitglieder der Republikanischen Partei mit traditionellen außenpolitischen Präferenzen (das sogenannte Establishment) Teile von Trumps anti-internationalistischer Agenda ablehnten. Das gilt insbesondere für solche Politiken, die etablierten GOP-Positionen mit Bezug zu vitalen Sicherheitsinteressen der USA widersprachen. Gleichzeitig unterstützten die Republikaner im Kongress Trump in Politikfeldern, in denen die GOP ihre langjährigen Politikpräferenzen fortsetzen konnte, insbesondere im Bereich der Rüstungskontroll- und Abrüstungspolitik.

Schlüsselwörter Polarisierung · Außenpolitik · Rüstungskontrolle · Entwicklungshilfe · Republikaner

1 Introduction

Donald J. Trump's presidency was unorthodox in many respects. Foreign and security policies can certainly be considered as one such notable example. His "America First" platform, while often viewed as populist politics, entailed concrete policy positions, not least ones that diverged from the traditional role of the United States in the international arena. A core strategy of Trump's foreign policy was, for example, the withdrawal from international organizations and international commitments, ranging from climate policy agreements to arms control treaties. These decisions thus had a transformative impact on international politics, with severe repercussions for traditional U.S. allies in Europe and Asia (see Herr and Müller 2019), making this facet of "Trumpism" a relevant case of analysis within the scope of this special issue. While numerous studies have focused on the Trump administration's foreign and security policies (see, e.g., Löffmann 2019; Cooley and Nexon 2020; Olsen 2021), this article considers the domestic support and contestation toward President Trump's international policies in Congress, and here in particular the role of the Republican Party (GOP).

Given Trump's predominant influence over the Republican Party, in particular his loyal base (see Blum and Parker 2019), one could have expected little resistance to the administration's "swinging the wrecking ball" toward the traditional pillars of U.S. foreign policy. Indeed, GOP members in the House of Representatives and the Senate overall supported Trump in 92% and 87% of all roll call votes, respectively.¹ And yet, some of Trump's most prominent defeats in Congress concerned international issues: For example, the strengthening of sanctions against Russia in July 2017 (H.R. 3364), and Congress's only successful veto override against Trump on the defense budget in December 2020 (H.R. 6395). At the same time, GOP members of Congress (MoC) regularly applauded Trump's "America First" policy. Tom Cotton (R-AR), for example, a staunch supporter of the president's policies, described the "America First" doctrine as "healthy nationalism" (cited in Beauchamp 2017). In a similar vein, Representative Mark Meadows (R-NC) hailed Trump's decision to end the Iran nuclear deal as a "victory for a safer and more secure America" (cited in Homan and Lantis 2020, p. 151).

What explains this variance in defiance and acquiescence among GOP members in Congress? This pattern is puzzling not only in view of Trump's dominance of the GOP on many domestic policy issues, but also in regard to post-Cold War foreign policy. For example, the Republican Party remained typically loyal to their president, George W. Bush, even after public criticism rose against the war in Iraq (Goble and Holm 2009, p. 226). Furthermore, if bipartisanship in foreign policy is generally in decline and "hyperpartisanship" is the new norm (Trubowitz and Harris 2019, p. 619; see Schultz 2017), we would expect support for the president on international issues to follow partisan patterns.

To address this puzzle, I will first trace the extent and contours of polarization in Congress on foreign policy, with a particular focus on the Obama and Trump presidencies, to systematically assess the degree of support and opposition in a comparative perspective. The analysis underscores that the reaction to Trump's "America First" policy was not uniform. To further reveal the sources of the variance, the paper then presents a comparative case study on two policy areas with mixed GOP positioning: foreign aid (contra Trump) and arms control (pro Trump). The analysis also considers to what extent Republicans in Congress continued or shifted their position from Obama to Trump. In sum, the article indicates that traditionalists among Republicans opposed some of Trump's anti-internationalist policies, in particular those that contradicted established GOP ideological positions regarding vital U.S. security interests. At the same time, Republicans supported Trump on issues where the GOP could continue its policy preference (in particular, arms control).

Understanding GOP positioning toward Trump on international issues is not only relevant in order to fully grasp the partisan dynamics within the Republican Party, but is also significant in view of the impact of the domestic politics of U.S. foreign policy on international relations. Congressional assertiveness against Trump may have, for example, reassured European allies that the nationalist “America First” agenda would not be fully implemented. Connectedly, contestation against Trump’s foreign policy, including from within the Republican Party, signaled international partners—but arguably adversaries, too—that the Trump administration’s policies might be reversed in the case of a new president. Seen from this perspective, the article contributes to this special issue’s aim to understand the “complexly contested” U.S. policies and politics.

¹ 115th and 116th Congress (2017–2021), own calculation, based on data by FiveThirtyEight.com (2021).

2 Polarization Beyond the Water’s Edge: State of the Art and Research Propositions

Although it is well established that partisan polarization did not start with Donald Trump (Berg 2021, p. 38), his divisive campaign and unorthodox presidency are commonly described as an additional catalyst for societal and elite polarization (see Sirakov 2020; Harnisch and Friedrichs 2021). While polarization on domestic issues, such as economic and social issues, abortion rights, gun control, and environmental policies, has led to entrenched positions and gridlock in Washington, D.C., as well as to polarization between the federal government and the states (e.g., Jacobsen 2013; Sonnicksen 2022), the extent of polarization on international issues has been subject to scholarly debate. Conventional wisdom in the United States has long been that politics “stops at the water’s edge” (see Lewis 2017). In other words, foreign and security policy issues are exempt from the typical partisan infighting that structures domestic politics, also because there had been a rather broad internationalist consensus among major parties regarding the U.S. role as a liberal hegemon (Trubowitz and Harris 2019). Foreign policy scholars have diagnosed cracks in this overarching consensus since the war in Vietnam, when Congress and the president fought over budget and strategy of the intervention, while voters took to the street to protest the war (McCormick and Wittkopf 1990).² With the end of the Cold War, another important source for the remaining stability of the consensus on international issues disappeared (DeLaet and Scott 2006). Against this backdrop, Kupchan and Trubowitz (2007) have argued that foreign policy bipartisanship has declined since the 1970s and that the terrorist attacks of 9/11 failed to produce a new consensus.

Kupchan and Trubowitz’s provocative thesis of a “dead center” (2007) on international issues in Congress has received criticism. Chaudion et al. (2010), for example, offer an alternative argument focusing on substantive legislation (instead of all roll call votes) and contend that the “center still holds.” Despite the extensive body of research that this controversy produced (see Hurst and Wroe 2016; Trubowitz and Mellow 2011), there is still no consensus among scholars on whether polarization on foreign and security policy is continuously on the rise to an extent more or less akin to the development on domestic issues (see Friedrichs and Tama 2022 for a recent overview). Several findings can be distilled from this research nonetheless: First, polarization on international issues is relatively lower compared to that on domestic issues, and there is still more bipartisanship on foreign and security policy than on domestic topics (Bryan and Tama 2021, p. 15; Wagner 2020, p. 49). Second, there is substantial variance within the issue area of international politics. In some areas, foreign policy decisions during the post–Cold War era have become highly politicized, unlike before 1991. This includes issues such as arms control (Kreps et al. 2018), human rights (Homan and Lantis 2020), and military interventions (Böller 2022). In other issue areas, for example foreign aid, antiterror policies, and sanctions against foreign adversaries, bipartisan cooperation proved to be more resilient (Tama 2018, 2020).³ Third, ideological polarization among legislators has been identified as a key source of declining bipartisanship (Hildebrandt et al. 2013; Jeong and Quirk 2019). This means that members of Congress hold relatively stable ideological views that inform their policy decisions. Fourth, research on foreign policy in Congress has recently highlighted the emergence of unusual coalitions, for example between left-wing Democrats and libertarian Republicans criticizing presidential infringements on congressional war powers (Müller 2020), and cross-partisan coalitions in favor of trade agreements (Friedrichs 2022).

² Also, during the Carter and Reagan administrations, Republicans and Democrats fought over key foreign policy issues, including arms control and the strategy against the Soviet Union (Meernik 1993, p. 660). However, while particular strategies and approaches (e.g., multilateralism vs. unilateralism) were disputed, the overarching internationalist orientation remained largely uncontested, and scholars typically diagnose an increase in partisan disagreement after the end of the Cold War (see Prins and Marshall 2001, p. 660; Myrick 2021).

In view of the state of the art and the insights on polarization in foreign and security policy, it is possible to develop specific hypotheses guiding the subsequent analysis. Given the focus of this article on the role of Republicans in Congress during the Trump presidency, the aim is to identify plausible mechanisms and motives for members of Congress to position themselves vis à vis the president. Three factors seem particularly important, given the previous findings in the literature.

First, the standard model of politics in Congress suggests that electoral concerns are important for rational actors within the legislative branch (see Mayhew 2004). After all, members of the House of Representatives face short electoral cycles (i.e., 2-year terms), and Senators, despite serving longer terms of 6 years, still depend on their constituency. Therefore, we should expect legislators to represent the majority interests of their voters. At the same time, this responsiveness depends on the extent of majority interests (unclear majorities provide more leeway for MoC), the salience of an issue, and the partisan divide (MoC may focus on representing their core partisan base) (see Foyle 2017; Busby and Monten 2012). The president also factors into electoral concerns. Opposing the president may be electorally dangerous for members of the president's party in Congress, in particular on foreign policy, where the executive has higher control over the agenda (see Howell and Pevehouse 2005, p. 216; Villalobos and Sirin 2012, p. 36).

³ Nota bene, there are important examples of bipartisanship and cross-partisanship, even in more polarized fields, including cross-partisan criticism against President Obama regarding the Libya intervention (see Böller 2022, p. 681) and bipartisan human rights legislation regarding Russia (e.g., the 2012 Magnitsky Act) and China (regarding Hong Kong) (see Tama 2021, p. 26–27).

Second, as previous research has demonstrated, foreign and security policy choices are influenced by partisan ideology (see Lewis 2017; Busby et al. 2020). In some policy areas, parties have developed distinct profiles, which MoC may adhere to even if public preferences shift. Regarding international issues, this applies, for example, to the support for the military and military means of foreign policy among Republicans (see Dueck 2010), or to the support for human rights issues among Democrats (see Kotb and Jeong 2021). Remnants of bipartisanship, on the other hand, can be explained by converging ideological views and shared definitions of national interests and threat perceptions, which in turn inform acceptable policies (for instance, regarding adversaries or antiterror operations; see Böller and Müller 2018).

Third, executive–legislative relations are structured by the institutional setting (see Homan and LaDeur 2021). While conventional wisdom holds that presidents dominate foreign policy decision-making (see Peterson 1994), Congress possesses various avenues of influence in foreign policy (see Scott and Carter 2002). This includes, for instance, congressional war powers, the Senate’s role in the advice and consent process for international treaties, and direct legislative influence through specific resolutions and the budget process. However, the availability of legislative tools differs across policy areas (see Lindsay and Ripley 1994). For example, the “power of the purse” is a strong tool to exert direct influence on the defense or international affairs budget. In contrast, other policy fields, for example crisis policy (such as military interventions) and strategic decisions (such as nuclear strategy), are dominated by the executive branch to a larger degree. Here, Congress may set limits and influence long-term strategies or use its oversight authority to scrutinize and contest the president, but it is less capable of influencing (or stopping) short-term policy decisions by the president.

Taken together, these factors allow us to develop two sets of core hypotheses and one conditional hypothesis regarding the behavior of GOP members of Congress on international issues.

Hypothesis 1a: Republican support for Trump’s foreign policy was strong on issues that were ideologically divisive between Democrats and the GOP (partisan ideology), Hypothesis 1b: Republican support for Trump’s foreign policy was strong where Trump’s position represented the preferences of GOP voters (electoral concerns).

What follows from these hypotheses is that Republicans supported Trump’s anti-internationalist “America First” doctrine on issues that have been long-contested under previous Democratic administrations and where the Republican Party establishment and base were united, producing a convergence between Trump and traditional GOP positions.

Hypothesis 2a: Republican support for Trump’s foreign policies was low on issues that contradicted traditional ideological positions regarding vital U.S. national interests (partisan ideology).

Hypothesis 2b: Republican support for Trump’s foreign policies was low on issues where Trump’s positions were at odds with core constituency interests (electoral concerns).

The second set of hypotheses suggests that establishment Republicans may oppose some of Trump’s most anti-internationalist policies. This pertains in particular to policies that threatened perceived core national security interests or where members of Congress did not have to fear electoral consequences (e.g., because Trump’s proposals were unpopular, even among Republican voters).

The last conditional hypothesis concerns the institutional setting.

Hypothesis 3: Republican positioning on Trump’s foreign policy depends on institutional avenues of influence, with higher leverage on structural policy fields (e.g., budget, sanctions) and lower influence on crisis policies (e.g., military interventions) and strategic issues (e.g., arms control).

The empirical part of the article will probe the plausibility of the hypotheses with an analysis of the broader voting patterns on the one hand and a qualitative case study on two policy issues (foreign aid and arms control) on the other hand.

3 Less Polarized than Expected: Voting Patterns on Foreign and Security Policy

Roll call votes in Congress provide the opportunity to investigate the broader patterns of partisan alignment across issues over time. It should be noted, however, that the focus on roll call votes may overestimate the extent of polarization because it excludes unrecorded votes, which were presumably less controversial (see Bryan and Tama 2022, p. 8). Mindful of this limitation, the first step of the empirical analysis investigates voting records in the House and Senate to grasp the development of contestation in U.S. foreign policy on the legislative level.

For this purpose, I make use of the Comparative Agendas Project (2022) dataset, which in turn relies on Voteview data (Lewis et al. 2022) and which includes a coding for policy areas. Considering the policy issues of defense (e.g., alliances, military interventions), foreign trade (e.g., trade agreements), and international affairs (e.g., foreign aid, sanctions) as “international” allows us to compare the voting records with all other issues (“domestic”). I focus on the post–Cold War era (since 1991) and calculate the average Agreement Index (AI) as introduced by Hix et al. (2007). Ranging from 0 to 1, the score equals 1 if all members of the legislature vote the same way. The score equals 0 if one-third each votes “yes,” “no,” and abstains. Using the AI instead of other indicators, such as bipartisanship (Kupchan and Trubowitz 2007) or the Rice Index, has the advantage of offering a score that can then also be used to compare the U.S. Congress to other legislatures, as comparative research on parliaments and security policy predominantly uses the AI (see Ostermann and Wagner 2023). However, the AI cannot be considered a direct measurement of polarization (if understood as the growth of extreme positions on the political spectrum), but rather as an indicator of the level of politicization and disagreement within Congress on an issue.

Fig. 1 Agreement in Congress on domestic and international issues, 1991–2020. Source: Own analysis, based on data by the Comparative Agendas Project (2022), amended by the author. AI Agreement Index

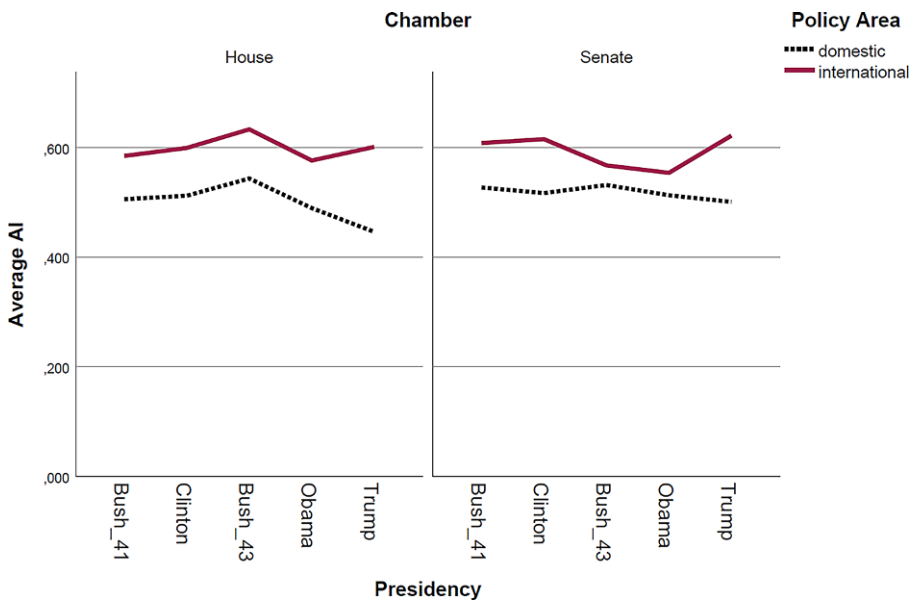

Fig. 2 Agreement in House and Senate on domestic and international issues, presidential terms 1991–2020. Source: Own analysis, based on data by the Comparative Agendas Project (2022), amended by the author. AI Agreement Index

A first look at the data (see Fig. 1) corroborates the thesis of growing politicization on domestic issues (see Theriault 2008; McCarthy et al. 2016) and on international issues (see Trubowitz and Mellow 2011, p. 168). Despite the overall trend,⁴ there are notable fluctuations. Phases of relatively high disagreement during the George H. W. Bush administration and the Obama administration (in particular, 2011–2016) contrast with years of more cohesion on the congressional level, not surprisingly, for example, after 9/11 during the first term of the George W. Bush presidency and also in 2009 (see Fig. 2).

If we distinguish between particular areas of international politics, the analysis of the AI reveals some noteworthy shifts in the traditional patterns during the Trump presidency (Table 1). Disagreement was particularly pronounced on defense procurement and human rights compared with previous administrations. Also, roll call votes on military operations and arms control remained controversial—a trend already started during Obama’s presidency. Interestingly, however, during the Trump administration, the level of agreement on the issues of trade, foreign aid, alliances, and international organizations increased against the trend. This could be interpreted as an indication for an overarching consensus among both Democrats and Republicans, who cooperated to fend off some of Trump’s most controversial policies, such

Table 1 Average agreement across selected policy fields, presidential terms, 1991–2020

	Bush (41)		Clinton		Bush (43)		Obama		Trump		Average 1991–2020
	AI	n	AI	n	AI	n	AI	n	AI	n	AI	n
Alliances	0.66	2	0.62	50	0.70	15	0.54	9	0.89	7	0.65	83
Defense procurement	0.37	23	0.47	67	0.53	28	0.56	53	0.30	7	0.48	178
Foreign aid	0.65	22	0.63	32	0.49	45	0.51	41	0.76	12	0.57	152
Human rights	0.90	7	0.80	30	0.80	51	0.80	22	0.68	26	0.78	136
IOs	0.96	3	0.62	33	0.64	48	0.46	7	0.63	4	0.63	95
Military operations	0.76	19	0.52	36	0.53	98	0.43	79	0.45	16	0.51	248
Nuclear arms	0.68	14	0.58	52	0.56	19	0.49	50	0.46	8	0.55	143
Terrorism	0.69	3	0.83	21	0.74	38	0.70	16	0.88	4	0.76	82
Trade agreements	0.57	14	0.57	65	0.49	58	0.50	35	0.74	5	0.54	177

Source: Own analysis, based on data by the Comparative Agendas Project (2022), amended by the author. Boldface indicates that t-test is statistically significant ($P < 0.01$) for average value Trump vs. other presidents. AI Agreement Index, IO international organization as gutting of the foreign aid budget. Similarly, the agreement on alliances may be connected to the attempt to signal support for NATO and other allies in view of Trump's outspoken criticism against these institutions (see Tama 2021).

⁴ The exact trendline formula for domestic issues is ($y = -0.0009x + 0.6131$; $r^2 = 0.02$) and for international issues is ($y = -0.0022x + 0.5442$; $r^2 = 0.17$).

To investigate this initial finding further, I focus more specifically on the Obama and Trump years, and here on the "key votes" in the Senate. The key votes are coded by experts of Congressional Quarterly based on whether votes presented "a matter of controversy, of presidential or political power, or a matter of potentially great impact on the nation" (Rollcall 2020). There are two arguments to justify this selection. First, the Senate has a more consequential role in foreign and security policy than the House, given its treaty powers and the traditional weight of its international affairs-related committees (Foreign Relations and Armed Services). Second, one criticism against using broad voting record analysis is that the records are skewed by the much more numerous votes on other matters (for example, on various mundane amendments and procedural votes). Therefore, focusing on the most important votes will yield different, and presumably more indicative, results.

The resulting dataset includes 97 key votes for the Obama administration and 33 during the Trump presidency. For this dataset, I use bipartisanship as an indicator for the level of disagreement, defined as a vote in which the majority of party A votes in the same direction as the majority of party B. The dataset was also augmented

Table 2 Analysis of key votes in the Senate, 2009–2021, 111th–116th congressional terms

		Obama		Trump
		Domestic policy	Foreign policy	Domestic policy	Foreign policy
Bipartisan		16	5	3	5
Partisan		61	15	21	4
Sum		77	20	24	9
Considering presidential position
Bipartisan	Pro-presidential bipartisanship	12	2	1	1
	Anti-presidential bipartisanship	0	1	0	3
Bipartisanship (no presidential position)		4	2	2	1
Partisan	Cross-partisanship pro president	10	4	0	0
	Cross-partisanship against president	3	1	3	4
	Cross-partisanship (no presidential position)	7	1	2	0
	Party-line vote pro president	23	4	12	0
Party-line vote against president		8	0	0	0
Party-line vote (no presidential position)		10	5	4	0
–	Sum	77	20	24	9

Own analysis based on data by Lewis et al. (2022) and Crespin and Rohde (2022), amended by the author. Bipartisan = majorities of both parties vote in the same direction; partisan = majorities of both parties vote in opposite directions; cross-partisan = minority support from one party necessary to win the vote; party-line vote = majority of one party sufficient to win the vote with a coding for the presidential position on each key vote in order to understand whether Congress supported or rejected a presidential position.⁵

The analysis (Table 2) produces several relevant findings: First, bipartisanship on foreign policy issues was more frequent than on domestic issues. Second, while the level of bipartisanship on domestic issues from Obama to Trump declined considerably, from 20% to 12.5%, bipartisanship on international issues was more frequent in the Senate under Trump. An astonishing 55.6% of all key foreign and security policy votes in the Senate during the 115th and 116th Congress were bipartisan.

Yet, as Tama (2021) has argued, the traditional perspective of foreign policy bipartisanship as an expression of overwhelming support for the president by both parties in Congress may not present the full picture. Indeed, considering the policy direction of the key votes in the Senate reveals that the increase in bipartisanship during the Trump presidency was rather unusual. Thus, a third relevant finding is that during the Trump presidency, only one case of pro-presidential bipartisanship can be detected. In three cases, a bipartisan majority formed against the president. Furthermore, in four cases, Trump lost a key foreign policy vote (i.e., the majority voted against his declared policy preference) due to an unusual alliance between the majority of Democratic Senators and a minority of Republicans (what can be termed as “cross-partisanship”). In contrast, President Obama lost only one key vote due to “anti-presidential bipartisanship” (Tama 2021), the Justice Against Sponsors of Terrorism Act.⁶ In addition, Congress defied Obama regarding the fiscal year 2016 National Defense Authorization Act due to cross-partisanship. Among other reasons, Obama objected to the bill because it entailed the restriction of funds for the president’s plan to close the Guantanamo detention facility (see Poplin 2015).

Upon closer inspection, the only case of pro-presidential bipartisanship in the Senate during Trump’s presidency was the passage of H.R. 601 in September 2017, a package that included funding for disaster relief and defense purposes, after a deal was struck with Democrats.

Key votes against Trump’s declared preferences pertained to sanction policy, military interventions, and defense policy issues. Regarding sanctions, lawmakers clearly opposed Trump’s initial intent to soften the sanctions regime against Russia. H.R. 3334 passed both chambers of Congress in July 2017 with veto-proof majorities (Senate: 98:2; House: 419:3) to reaffirm and expand the sanctions against Russia and preempt Trump’s rapprochement efforts with Putin. This assertiveness seems connected to an overarching consensus regarding the threat posed by Russia to U.S. national security. While the final vote was almost unanimous in both chambers, it is notable that the legislative process was spearheaded by Democrats as well as Republicans. The most active Republicans in the Senate here included John McCain (R-AZ), Lindsey Graham (R-SC), and Bob Corker (R-TN), who can be described as Republican establishment (see Böller and Herr 2020). The Senate later also passed—with 11 Republicans joining Democrats—a nonbinding resolution criticizing Trump’s maneuvers to circumvent the sanctions (S.J. Res. 2).

⁵ The presidential position was gauged by using the PIPC Roll Call Dataset (Crespin and Rohde 2022) and data from FiveThirtyEight’s (2021) Congress tracker for the Trump presidency. Where other data were unavailable, each case was reviewed individually regarding presidential statements of policy.

⁶ The bill narrowed foreign sovereign immunity and granted federal courts more leeway in deciding cases regarding state-supported terrorism. President Obama vetoed the bill because he feared other states would enact similar laws. It was Obama’s only case of veto override.

The second major area of congressional opposition against President Trump’s foreign policy concerns military interventions. Here, a cross-partisan coalition formed to criticize U.S. support for the Saudi-led alliance in the Yemen civil war; S.J. Res. 54 and S.J. Res. 7 aimed at limiting U.S. involvement. This attempt ultimately failed due to Trump’s veto, which this coalition could not override. A bipartisan majority, on the other hand, expressed discontent with Trump’s proposed withdrawal from Syria. This measure (S. 1 - Strengthening America’s Security in the Middle East Act of 2019) was, nota bene, non-binding. Several aspects of the politics of military interventions under Trump are insightful. On the one hand, the voting records indicate division within the GOP regarding Yemen (and also Iran),⁷ where most Republicans sided with their president, and only a small group opposed Trump. On the other hand, in line with the argument that bipartisanship depends on shared perceptions of national interests, Trump’s sudden shift in antiterror operations regarding Syria provoked a broad outcry in Congress, as the shift was seen as harmful to U.S. security (see O’Brian 2019). Yet this policy area also underscores the relevance of the institutional perspective: Congress’ influence on Trump’s decisions was also limited due to the ineffectiveness of congressional war powers.⁸

In the area of defense, the Senate disapproved of Trump’s weapons sale to Saudi Arabia (S.J. Res. 36), in line with previous criticism against the war in Yemen, but the cross-partisan coalition failed to override the president’s veto. In contrast, Congress was successful in overriding Trump’s veto against H.R. 6395, the defense authorization bill for the fiscal year of 2021. Among other reasons, Trump opposed the bill because it sought to limit his ability to implement the withdrawal of troops from Afghanistan, as well as from Germany and South Korea. Here, a veto-proof bipartisan majority signaled its intention to uphold U.S. commitments to its allies, an issue area where Republicans and Democrats view vital security interests at stake (see Tama 2021, p. 30).

To summarize this first step of the analysis, contestation over foreign and security policy increased over time, although to a small degree and with fluctuations between administrations. In particular, during the Trump administration, bipartisanship on international issues increased, gauged by key votes in the Senate. At least on some policy issues, including military interventions, relations with Russia, and the defense budget, lawmakers aimed to provide a check on Trump’s policies (see Tama 2021, pp. 25–35).

⁷ A cross-partisan coalition also formed to contest Trump’s Iran policies when tensions escalated after the killing of Iranian general Qasem Soleimani in January 2020. A majority in Congress feared that Trump could start a military intervention, unauthorized by the legislative branch of government. The Iran War Powers Resolution (S.J. Res. 68) passed the Senate (55:45) with the support of eight Republicans and passed the House (227:186) with the support of six Republicans. This cross-partisan coalition lacked the votes to override Trump’s veto against the resolution. The resolution was not coded as a key vote.

⁸ Military operations in Syria have not been specifically authorized by Congress. This is indicative of the general assessment of the ineffectiveness of the underlying War Powers Resolution as the primary institutional framework (and also applies to Trump’s predecessors; see Müller 2020).

The analysis also underscores the puzzle of the variance in congressional responses on foreign and security policies. Areas of anti-presidential bipartisanship stand in contrast to issues such as arms control, where Congress remained largely silent in view of Trump's focused attempt to dismantle key international agreements. In the following section, I therefore aim to analyze the sources of this variance.

4 Between Defiance and Support: Congress and the Politics of Foreign Aid and Arms Control Under Trump

In order to understand the puzzling variance in congressional positioning toward Trump's foreign and security policies, I will present two case vignettes in a comparative perspective: foreign aid and arms control. The case selection is based on two arguments: First, to understand the variance, cases of congressional assertiveness as well as acquiescence need to be included. As the previous section indicated, foreign aid policies have been contested, while arms control policies received either support or were met with silence from Capitol Hill. Second, the case selection aims to focus on policy fields with varying opportunities for congressional involvement in foreign affairs, due to their institutional setting. Whereas foreign aid pertains to the structural policy field with high chances of congressional influence, arms control policies are part of the strategic policy area with comparatively lower institutional leverage for Congress (Lindsay and Ripley 1994).

4.1 Foreign Aid: Bipartisan Opposition Against Budget Cuts

Putting American interests first has been a core slogan of Trump's foreign policy doctrine, both as candidate and president. In his major foreign policy speech during the campaign in 2016, Trump described his policy: "We're rebuilding other countries while weakening our own. Ending the theft of American jobs will give us resources we need to rebuild our military, which has to happen and regain our financial independence and strength" (Trump cited in The New York Times 2016). The stated rationale behind this doctrine was to prioritize economic welfare and military strength while avoiding spending taxpayers' money for purposes beyond narrowly defined national interests, such as the promotion of democracy and liberal values abroad (see Lacatus 2021).

Trump's statements and proposals followed up on his campaign promises. Repeatedly throughout his presidency, Trump intended to slash funding for foreign assistance programs by between 20% and 30% according to presidential funding requests (see CRS 2021). The budgetary cuts specifically targeted programs related to climate change, countries in Central America (presumably to force them to change their immigration policies), and HIV/AIDS programs (see CRS 2021, pp. 1 and 16), thus reflecting an ideological orientation. Furthermore, Trump sought to redirect the remaining funds to supposedly friendly states. The latter strategy reflected Trump's transactionalist orientation. Accordingly, the distribution of aid should be based on U.S.-supportive voting behavior in international institutions, as indicated in the 2018 State of the Union Address (Trump White House 2018; see Igoe 2020).

Fig. 3 Funding for foreign assistance (USD, billions, fiscal years). Reported data for fiscal year 2021 incomplete. Source: Own depiction based on data by USAID (2022)

However, a bipartisan majority among Democrats and Republicans in Congress fought back and defended large parts of the existing funding and programs. In particular, presidential attempts to cut the funding for foreign aid remained unsuccessful. As Fig. 3 shows, in each year of the Trump administration (starting with the budget process for fiscal year 2018 in 2017), the funds appropriated by Congress exceeded the president’s initial budget request. Thus, the overall appropriated budget for international development and bilateral security assistance remained stable compared to the last year of the Obama administration. It is not unusual that presidential budget requests and appropriated funds differ—for example, due to new emergencies or to protracted budgetary negotiations. In the case of Trump, the differences clearly resulted from the 45th president’s declared goal to cut funding and Congress’s outright opposition to that (see Tama 2021, pp. 33–35).

Already Trump’s first budget plan in 2017 met bipartisan opposition in Congress regarding foreign aid. In June 2017 during congressional hearings, Senator Graham, for example, bemoaned, “this budget request is radical and reckless when it comes to soft power” (cited in Saldinger 2017). Graham, renowned as a foreign policy hawk (see Martin 2013) and indicative of Republican establishment in foreign and security policy, maintained that soft power was “just as important as any military power we have” (cited in Saldinger 2017).

Similarly, in 2018, House Foreign Affairs Committee chairman Ed Royce (R-CA) declared his opposition to Trump’s budget cuts: “A strong, bipartisan coalition in Congress has already acted once to stop deep cuts to the State Department and Agency for International Development that would have undermined our national security ... This year, we will act again” (cited in Toosi 2018). Time and time again, a bipartisan opposition formed against the president to defeat plans perceived as “detrimental to our national security.”⁹

⁹ Quoted in an August 2019 letter, signed by the chairpersons and ranking members of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs and Senate Foreign Relations Committee (House 2019).

The Trump administration's foreign aid agenda was also contested outside Congress. Nongovernmental organizations, former officials of Republican administrations, and a group of former generals and admirals protested the budget plans and stated their conviction that "elevating and strengthening diplomacy and development alongside defense are critical to keeping America safe" (cited in U.S. Global Leadership Coalition 2017). Even conservative think tanks, such as Rand and Brookings, denounced the plans as dangerous to U.S. security interests (Cohen 2020; Ingram 2017). What these statements from within and outside Congress have in common is a legitimization based on a definition of national interests that is broader than Trump's narrow "America First" doctrine.

Beyond the defended budget, congressional assertiveness also led to intensified investigation and oversight—most notably in the case of Trump's first impeachment due to withheld security assistance funding for Ukraine—and to reasserted congressional authority over the foreign aid programs (see CRS 2021). However, Trump's attempts to reform the foreign assistance programs were not without effects. The Trump administration used unilateral executive measures to circumvent congressional limits and to withheld funds to multilateral institutions, such as the Human Rights Council, the United Nations Population Fund, and the World Health Organization (see CRS 2021, pp. 2–3; Regilme 2022, pp. 10–19).

Public opinion polls do not indicate that MoC received clear electoral signals to position themselves in this policy field. On the one hand, the U.S. public in general seems skeptical of economic aid to other countries. When asked in 2017 whether to increase, cut, or keep federal spending for this purpose, 50% of respondents favored cuts, 32% continuance, and 10% expansion. On the other hand, questions pertaining to specific programs (e.g., food and medical assistance, economic development) reveal that majorities of both Republicans and Democrats support foreign aid, although Democrats show higher levels of support (CCGA 2017a). In addition, foreign aid topics generally are less salient to voters compared with other foreign policy issues (Hurst et al. 2017, p. 452).

In sum, this case vignette lends support for Hypothesis 1a, as we find bipartisan agreement rather than division. Hypothesis 2a is also corroborated, as Trump's proposals contradicted long-term positions held by Republicans—and in this case, in bipartisan fashion, also Democrats. As electoral incentives do not indicate a clear direction, Hypothesis 2b is rejected.

Seen from an institutional perspective, Congress possessed constitutionally mandated powers to check the president's policy preferences. The policy field can be classified as a "structural" environment (Lindsay and Ripley 1994, p. 10). Here, the power over the federal budget and the oversight authority to investigate and review institutional reforms provide Congress with enough leverage to assert itself against the president. This finding is in line with Hypothesis 3 regarding the institutional setting. Combined with the bipartisan agreement between Republicans and Democrats, the basic tenets of U.S. foreign aid policies withstood Trump's agenda.

4.2 Arms Control: Ideological Division Fueling Support for “America First”

The withdrawal from international arms control agreements was one of Trump’s signature elements of his “America First” platform. This policy strategy also has a clear ideological orientation and connection to core “Trumpism,” as it frees the United States from binding commitments, conforms to Trump’s transactionalist orientation, and implements a narrow focus on national security interests. To be sure, other presidents before Trump have at times resorted to unilateralism and have dissolved international commitments (see G.W. Bush’s withdrawal from the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty in 2002; Kubbig 2005). However, Trump’s actions had a broader scope, including not only the Iran nuclear deal but also the Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces (INF) Treaty, the Open Skies Treaty, and the Arms Trade Treaty.¹⁰ Trump was also more consistent than Bush in this regard, as the latter also initiated new arms control agreements, such as the Strategic Offensive Reduction Treaty (SORT) and the International Code of Conduct Against Ballistic Missile Proliferation (ICOC).

Despite being a signature element of Trump’s foreign policy doctrine, the president’s treaty politics cannot be seen as an invention of Trump. Rather, there are sources of inspiration among Republicans in Congress who politicized the issue of arms control well before Trump (see Kubbig 2005; Kühn 2019). During the Obama administration, arms control and non-proliferation policies provoked controversies between Democrats and Republicans. Obama could barely secure the necessary support from Republican senators for the ratification of the New START Treaty in 2010—a traditional bilateral arms control agreement, similar to those previously supported by strong bipartisanship (see Kreps et al. 2018). Polarization further infected this policy field in the wake of the negotiations on the Iran nuclear deal. This agreement was fiercely contested by Republicans in Congress (see Friedrichs 2021). The final vote on the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action (JCPOA) in September 2015 illustrates the partisan division in this debate. Only four Democrats voted together with all 54 Republicans in the Senate in favor of a Joint Resolution of Disapproval against the deal. The attempt to stop the implementation of the executive agreement thus barely failed (see Schreyer and Wilzewski 2015, p. 3).¹¹ However, the protracted discussion and continuous attacks politicized the arms control negotiations. In this context, presidential candidate Trump joined Republicans in Congress and frequently denounced the agreement, criticizing it as “terrible” and “horrible” (cited in Trump Twitter Archive 2022).

The INF Treaty was also subject to criticism in Congress before Trump. Even the Obama administration publicly declared in 2014 that Russia is in violation of the treaty (see Department of State 2017). However, President Obama aimed at resolving the differences with Russia bilaterally and sought to preserve the treaty. This position was contested by Republicans in the 113th and 114th Congresses. Marco Rubio (R-FL), for example, introduced a resolution in 2014 that urged the administration to hold Russia accountable for its treaty violation (Rubio 2014).

¹⁰ Trump withdrew the signature to the Arms Trade Treaty, but the treaty was already a “zombie” after the Senate Republicans positioned themselves against the agreement in 2013.

¹¹ Treaty skeptics needed 60 votes for the cloture of the debate, which they failed by two Senators.

Similarly, Mike Rogers (R-AL), then chairman of the subcommittee on strategic forces, demanded in 2015 that the United States should not “be unilaterally bound by any treaty” while Russia is cheating (cited in Gertz 2015). This criticism was also shared by conservative think tanks, for example the Heritage Foundation, and supplemented by demands to modernize the U.S. nuclear arsenal (see Heinrichs 2014). Thus, unsurprisingly, leading Republicans, including ranking member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee Mike McCaul (TX), applauded Trump’s INF withdrawal decision (see Toosi et al. 2019).

Republican senators and representatives not only took aim at the INF Treaty but also attacked the multilateral Open Skies Treaty, even before Trump announced his intention to abandon the treaty (see Richter 2020). S.Res. 388, spearheaded by Ted Cruz (R-TX) and Tom Cotton (R-AR) demanded to terminate U.S. participation in the Open Skies Treaty. The resolution accused Russia of violating the agreement and pointed out that the United States “does not gain significant additional intelligence from participating in the Open Skies Treaty” (see Cotton 2019). The response on Capitol Hill to terminate participation in the Open Skies Treaty similarly followed partisan lines. While Senator Bob Menendez (D-NJ) denounced the withdrawal as “reckless,” Cruz and Cotton praised the president’s decision (Gould et al. 2020).

Ideological agreement thus seems to be the primary explanatory factor for the support among Republicans for Trump’s arms control policy (support for Hypothesis 1a). Public opinion surveys suggest that there were few clear electoral incentives for GOP members of Congress (contradicting Hypothesis 1b). Voters do not seem to have prioritized arms control, whereas China and international terrorism are perceived as the primary threats among Republican voters (CCGA 2020, p. 5). Opinion polls on the question of the Iran nuclear deal also do not suggest a clear electoral incentive. In 2017, Republican supporters were split in their assessment of the JCPOA (see CCGA 2017b). However, a majority of 73% among self-identified Republicans supported Trump’s INF Treaty withdrawal (CCGA 2019).

Seen from an institutional perspective, the Senate possesses veto powers over treaty ratification, may signal discontent over policies in the area of arms control, and can block new treaties.¹² However, the Senate and Congress in general have only a few options to stop unilateral presidential decisions, if, as in Trump’s case, the president opts to withdraw from a treaty.¹³ As this case vignette suggests, GOP Senators supported Trump’s arms control agenda because it aligned with already developed Republican positions in this policy field.

¹² Even in the case of new agreements, presidents can circumvent the two-thirds treaty ratification hurdle in the Senate by concluding executive agreements instead of international treaties (as Obama did with the JCPOA) (see Peake 2023).

¹³ In theory, the use of budgetary means could be one option, but Congress has, so far, lacked the will to put this to a test (see Glennon 1990 on the constitutional issue of treaty dissolution).

5 Conclusion

While there is no shortage of analyses on Trump's foreign and security policies (e.g., Lacatus 2021; Löffmann 2019; Ashbee and Hurst 2020), there has been a void in understanding the role of Republican senators and representatives in particular within International Relations and foreign policy analysis. In this article, I have sought to reduce this gap and provide answers to the puzzling variance of assertiveness and acquiescence among Republican members of Congress toward Trump's "America First" policies. Empirically, my paper argued that Republicans opposed some of Trump's anti-internationalist policies, in particular those that seemed to threaten core national interests. In some cases, President Trump faced a bipartisan coalition that put roadblocks on the paths toward the implementation of "America First," such as regarding sanction policies or the foreign aid budget. These efforts were spearheaded by established GOP senators who tried to defend traditional policy positions. At the same time, Republicans supported Trump on issues such as arms control and non-proliferation policies. The identified source of this alignment is ideological agreement. Republicans in Congress already favored a unilateral reorientation in this policy field under the Obama administration, and they were staunch opponents of the Iran nuclear deal. The impact of congressional criticism directed at Trump also depended on institutional avenues of influence: On foreign aid (and sanctions), Congress was able to use its power of the purse to pass binding legislation contradicting presidential positions. Against Trump's treaty withdrawal strategies, on the other hand, Congress remained powerless, despite the fact that the president's sole authority to dissolve treaties is at least questionable, even though such unilateral withdrawals are not unprecedented.¹⁴

While the empirical focus of this article has been congressional reactions to Trump, the results discussed here have relevant implications for other aspects of international affairs and domestic politics, too.

First, regarding the intrapartisan dynamics and the question of Trump's dominance of the GOP (as also discussed in other articles in this special issue), this case study suggests that there is substantial division and intraparty contestation against "Trumpism" (see Smeltz and Tama 2021). It also highlights at least partial resilience of traditional conservative policies, albeit to varying degrees.

Second, the results discussed in this article are also relevant from an institutional perspective. Congress can check the president in foreign policy and is not as powerless as sometimes portrayed (see Mann and Ornstein 2006). However, the degree of this role as a counterbalance depends on institutional avenues of influence. Whereas congressional entrepreneurs were able to shield foreign aid policies via their control over the budget, unilateral policies on arms control faced little congressional resistance (even from the minority), or they resulted in symbolic contestation only

¹⁴ A notable example is President Carter's withdrawal from the Mutual Defense Treaty with Taiwan in 1979. As the Supreme Court declined to review the legality of the decision in Goldwater v. Carter, the constitutionality of unilateral treaty withdrawal remains disputed (see Glennon 1990; Amirfar and Singh 2018).

(see the criticism on military intervention policies), also because of constrained institutional avenues of influence.

Third, congressional engagement also affects the outcome of foreign and security policy on the international level and is thus relevant for transatlantic partners as well. Trubowitz and Harris (2019, p. 619) have, for instance, argued that the decline in bipartisan agreement on foreign affairs reduces the “usable power available” to sustain the costly U.S. leadership role. My article provides a qualification to this argument and the broader literature on polarization in foreign and security policy (see also Friedrichs and Tama 2022). As the empirical analysis shows, the level of disagreement over foreign policy varies across policy fields. Furthermore, anti-presidential coalitions (see also Homan and Lantis 2020; Bryan and Tama 2022) may break the standard operating mode of partisan politics to stop policies that are perceived as harmful to national interests, when such perceptions are shared by a majority of Republicans and Democrats in Congress. In fact, Congress worked to cushion the effects of Trump’s “America First” agenda, for example by protecting important elements of U.S. soft power with the continued funding of the foreign aid budget. Despite the overall influence of Trump within the Republican Party, a more or less stubborn establishment was able to defend the remnants of an internationalist consensus.

Part of this consensus also remains intact regarding security alliances. This enabled Trump’s successor, President Joe Biden, to provide military aid for Ukraine’s defense against Russia, supported by a bipartisan coalition in Congress, although to varying degrees (see Gramer 2022).¹⁵ At the same time, there are important caveats regarding the remnants of the internationalist consensus in Washington, D.C.: On the one hand, polarization is affecting previously bipartisan policy fields, such as arms control, where Trump—supported by Republicans in Congress—was able to dissolve important international agreements. The ability to enter credible commitments in this policy area hence continues to be weakened (see Schultz 2017, p. 20). On the other hand, the contestation of presidential foreign policy results in mixed signals from different domestic actors, hurting the capacity of the United States to clearly communicate its preferences toward adversaries and allies.

Even if allies are reassured by congressional foreign policy activism, international reactions are ripe with unintended consequences and miscalculations. It may be argued that hedging strategies by European allies against an imminent withdrawal of its security guarantor were limited because foreign leaders were reassured by Congress of the continued reliability of the United States. However, it is plausible that allies underestimate that U.S. security commitments could be undermined again under a new president, following a doctrine similar to Trump’s. Furthermore, assertiveness on Capitol Hill is limited pursuant to the institutional setting in each policy area, and presidents can use unilateral tools to circumvent congressional checks on their foreign policy.

¹⁵ H.R. 6833, the latest Ukraine spending package in the 117th Congress, was passed 230:201 along partisan lines in the House (ten Republicans in favor) but with broader bipartisan support in the Senate 72:25 (22 Republicans in favor, 25 against).

Supplementary Information The online version of this article (<https://doi.org/10.1007/s11615-023-00466-2>) contains supplementary material, which is available to authorized users.

Funding Open Access funding enabled and organized by Projekt DEAL.

Open Access This article is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License, which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons licence, and indicate if changes were made. The images or other third party material in this article are included in the article's Creative Commons licence, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the article's Creative Commons licence and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder. To view a copy of this licence, visit <http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>.

References

- Amirfar, Catherine, and Ashika Singh. 2018. The trump administration and the “Unmaking” of international agreements. Harvard International Law Journal 59(2):443–460.
- Beauchamp, Zack. 2017. 2 Senate Republicans tried to define Trump's foreign policy—and gave opposite answers. Vox. <https://www.vox.com/world/2017/2/8/14549240/donald-trump-elliott-abrams-rand-paul-tom-cotton>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Berg, Manfred. 2021. The decline of political trust and the rise of populism in the United States. In Authority and trust in US culture and society. Interdisciplinary approaches and perspectives, ed. Manfred Berg, Günter Leypoldt, 37–60. Bielefeldt: transcript.
- Blum, Rachel M., and Christopher S. Parker. 2019. Trump-ing foreign affairs: status threat and foreign policy preferences on the right. Perspectives on Politics 17(3):737–755.
- Böller, Florian. 2022. Vandenberg vanished: US congress and the politicization of military interventions. Parliamentary Affairs 75(3):676–696.
- Böller, Florian, and Lukas D. Herr. 2020. From Washington without love: congressional foreign policy making and US-Russian relations under president trump. Contemporary Politics 26(1):17–37.
- Böller, Florian, and Marcus Müller. 2018. Unleashing the watchdogs: explaining congressional assertiveness in the politics of US military interventions. European Political Science Review 10(4):637–662.
- Bryan, James D., and Jordan Tama. 2022. The prevalence of bipartisanship in U.S. foreign policy: an analysis of important congressional votes. International Politics 59(5):874–897.
- Busby, Joshua W., and Jonathan Monten. 2012. Republican elites and foreign policy attitudes. Political Science Quarterly 127(1):105–142.
- Busby, Joshua, Craig Kafura, Jonathan Monten, and Jordan Tama. 2020. Multilateralism and the use of force: experimental evidence on the views of foreign policy elites. Foreign Policy Analysis 16(1):118–129.
- CCGA (Chicago Council on Global Affairs). 2017a. American support foreign aid, but oppose paying for it. <https://globalaffairs.org/sites/default/files/2020-11/Americans%20Support%20Foreign%20Aid%2C%20but%20Oppose%20Paying%20for%20It%20PDF%20Report.pdf>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- CCGA. 2017b. Americans support continued US participation in Iran deal. https://globalaffairs.org/sites/default/files/2021-07/report_ccs2017-iran-deal_171004.pdf. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- CCGA. 2019. Americans and Russians Agree: We're Heading towards a New Arms Race, March 2019, Chicago. <https://globalaffairs.org/research/public-opinion-survey/americans-and-russians-agree-were-heading-towards-new-arms-race>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- CCGA. 2020. Divided we stand: democrats and republicans diverge on US foreign policy. https://globalaffairs.org/sites/default/files/2020-12/report_2020ccs_america-divided_0.pdf. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Chaudoin, Stephen, Helen V. Milner, and Dustin Tingley. 2010. The center still holds, liberal internationalism survives. International Security 35(1):75–94.
- Cohen, Raphael S. 2020. Why we 'send them money'. Rand. <https://www.rand.org/blog/2020/12/why-we-send-them-money.html>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Comparative Agendas Project. 2022. Datasets/Codebooks. https://www.comparativeagendas.net/datasets_codebooks. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.

- Congressional Research Service. 2021. Selected Trump administration foreign aid priorities: a wrap-up, January 21. Washington: Congressional Research Service.
- Cooley, Alexander, and Daniel Nexon. 2020. Exit from hegemony: the unraveling of the American global order. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Cotton, Tom. 2019. The Open Skies treaty is giving Russia spying capabilities: End it. Washington Post. <https://www.washingtonpost.com/opinions/2019/12/10/open-skies-treaty-is-giving-russia-spying-capabilities-end-it/>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Crespin, Michael H., and David Rohde. 2022. Political institutions and public choice roll-call database. <https://ou.edu/carlabertcenter/research/pipc-votes/>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- DeLaet, C. James, and James Scott. 2006. Treaty-making and partisan politics: arms control and the US senate, 1960–2001. Foreign Policy Analysis 2(2):177–200.
- Department of State. 2017. INF treaty: at a glance. <https://2017-2021.state.gov/inf-treaty-at-a-glance/index.html>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Dueck, Colin. 2010. Hard line: the republican party and U.S. foreign policy since world war II. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Edward, Ashbee, and Steven Hurst. 2020. The Trump foreign policy record and the concept of transformational change. Global Affairs 6(1):5–19.
- FiveThirtyEight.com. 2021. Tracking congress in the age of Trump. <https://projects.fivethirtyeight.com/congress-trump-score/>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Foyle, Douglas. 2017. Public opinion and foreign policy. Oxford research encyclopedias, politics. <https://doi.org/10.1093/acrefore/9780190228637.013.472>.
- Friedrichs, Gordon. 2021. US global leadership role and domestic polarization: a role theory approach. New York: Routledge.
- Friedrichs, Gordon. 2022. Polarized we trade? Intra-party polarization and US trade policy. International Politics 59(5):956–980.
- Friedrichs, Gordon, and Jordan Tama. 2022. Polarization and US foreign policy: key debates and new findings. International Politics 59(5):767–785.
- Gertz, Bill. 2015. House bill to seek U.S. military response to russian treaty violation. Free Beacon. <https://freebeacon.com/national-security/house-bill-to-seek-u-s-military-response-to-russian-treaty-violation/>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Glennon, Michael J. 1990. Constitutional diplomacy. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Goble, Hannah, and Peter M. Holm. 2009. Breaking bonds? The Iraq war and the loss of republican dominance in national security. Political Research Quarterly 62(2):215–229.
- Gould, Joe, Valerie Insinna, and Aaron Mehta. 2020. Trump left the open skies treaty, but don't write it off yet. Air Force times. <https://www.airforcetimes.com/congress/2020/11/25/trump-left-the-open-skies-treaty-but-dont-write-it-off-yet/>. Accessed 12 Apr 2023.
- Gramer, Robble. 2022. Congress to Ukraine: we've still got your back. Foreign policy. <https://foreignpolicy.com/2022/11/21/ukraine-congress-war-russia-u-s-committed-republicans-democrats/>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Harnisch, Sebastian, and Gordon M. Friedrichs. 2021. Die polarisierten Staaten von Amerika und internationale Ordnungspolitik. Zeitschrift für Internationale Beziehungen 28(2):83–99.
- Heinrichs, Rebeccah. 2014. Obama turns a blind eye to the Russian rogue state. Heritage foundation. <https://www.heritage.org/europe/commentary/obama-turns-blind-eye-the-russian-rogue-state>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Herr, Lukas, and Marcus Müller. 2019. Einleitung: Weltmacht im Abseits. Die radikale Präsidentschaft Donald Trumps und die Außenpolitik der USA. In Weltmacht im Abseits: Amerikanische Außenpolitik in der Ära Donald Trump, ed. Lukas Herr, Marcus Müller, Anja Opitz, and Jürgen Wilzewski, 9–38. Baden-Baden: Nomos.
- Hildebrandt, Timothy, Courtney Hillebrecht, Peter M. Holm, and Jon Pevehouse. 2013. The domestic politics of humanitarian intervention: public opinion, partisanship, and ideology. Foreign Policy Analysis 9(3):243–266.
- Hix, Simon, Abdul G. Noury, and Gérard Roland. 2007. Democratic politics in the European parliament. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Homan, Patrick, and Scott LaDeur. 2021. Shifting constellations of congressional foreign policy during the Trump era. In Congress and foreign policy: activism, assertiveness, and acquiescence in a polarized era, ed. Ralph G. Carter, James M. Scott, 1–20. Lanham: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Homan, Patrick, and Jeffrey S. Lantis. 2020. The battle for US foreign policy: congress, parties, and factions in the 21st century. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.

- House. 2019. Congressional foreign policy leaders urge administration not to cancel funding for diplomacy & development. <https://foreignaffairs.house.gov/press-release/congressional-foreign-policy-leaders-urge-administration-not-to-cancel-funding-for-diplomacy-development/>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Howell, William, and Jon Pevehouse. 2005. Presidents, Congress, and the Use of Force. International Organization 59(1):209–232.
- Hurst, Steven, and Andrew Wroe. 2016. Partisan polarization and US foreign policy: Is the centre dead or holding? International Politics 53(5):666–682.
- Hurst, Reuben, Taylor Tidwell, and Darren Hawkins. 2017. Down the rathole? Public support for US foreign aid. International Studies Quarterly 61(2):442–454.
- Igoe, Michael. 2020. Disrupt and compete: How Trump changed US foreign aid. <https://www.devex.com/news/disrupt-and-compete-how-trump-changed-us-foreign-aid-97955>. Accessed 17 May 2023.
- Ingram, George. 2017. Myths about U.S. foreign aid, Brookings, April 7, 2017. <https://www.brookings.edu/blog/unpacked/2017/04/07/myths-about-u-s-foreign-aid/>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Introduction 2023. A Conservative (R)Evolution? Constitutional-political crises, Trumpism and long-standing trends of conservative transformations in the United States and beyond. Introduction to Special Issue. Manuscript.
- Jacobson, Gary C. 2013. Partisan polarization in American politics: a background paper. Presidential Studies Quarterly 43(4):688–708.
- Jeong, Gyung-Ho, and Paul J. Quirk. 2019. Division at the water's edge: the polarization of foreign policy. American Politics Research 47(1):58–87.
- Kotb, Shereen, and Gyung-Ho Jeong. 2021. The US congress and rogue states. Foreign Policy Analysis <https://doi.org/10.1093/fpa/orab011>.
- Kreps, Sarah, Elizabeth Saunders, and Kenneth Schultz. 2018. The ratification premium: Hawks, doves, and arms control. World Politics 70(4):479–514.
- Kubbig, Bernd W. 2005. America: escaping the legacy of the ABM treaty. Contemporary Security Policy 26(3):410–430.
- Kühn, Ulrich. 2019. The end of conventional arms control and the role of US congress. Journal for Peace and Nuclear Disarmament 2(1):253–273.
- Kupchan, Charles, and Peter Trubowitz. 2007. Dead center: the demise of liberal internationalism in the United States. International Security 32(2):7–44.
- Lacatus, Corinna. 2021. Populism and President Trump's approach to foreign policy: An analysis of tweets and rally speeches. Politics 41(1):31–47.
- Lewis, Verlan. 2017. The president and the parties' ideologies: party ideas about foreign policy since 1900. Presidential Studies Quarterly 47(1):27–61.
- Lewis, Jeffrey B., Keith Poole, Howard Rosenthal, Adam Boche, Aaron Rudkin, and Luke Sonnet. 2022. Voteview: congressional roll-call votes database. <https://voteview.com/>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Lindsay, James M., and Randall B. Ripley. 1994. How congress influences foreign and defense policy. Bulletin of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences 47(6):7–32.
- Löfflmann, Georg. 2019. America first and the populist impact on US foreign policy. Survival 61(6):115–138.
- Mann, Thomas E., and Norman J. Ornstein. 2006. The broken branch: how congress is failing america and how to get it back on track. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Martin, Jonathan. 2013. Vote on Syria sets up foreign policy clash between 2 wings of G.O.P. New York Times. <https://www.nytimes.com/2013/09/03/us/politics/syria-vote-sets-up-foreign-policy-clash-in-gop.html>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Mayhew, David R. 2004. Congress: the electoral connection. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Mccarty, Nolan, Keith T. Poole, and Howard Rosenthal. 2016. Polarized America: the dance of ideology and unequal riches. Cambridge: MIT Press.
- McCormick, James M., and Eugene R. Wittkopf. 1990. Bipartisanship, partisanship, and ideology in congressional executive foreign policy relations, 1947–1988. Journal of Politics 52(4):1077–1100.
- Meernik, James. 1993. Presidential support in Congress: conflict and consensus on foreign and defense policy. Journal of Politics 55(3):569–587.
- Müller, Marcus. 2020. No Blank Check: Der US-Kongress, Präsident Obama und die parlamentarische Kontrolle des Krieges gegen den internationalen Terrorismus, 2009–2017
- Myrick, Rachel. 2021. Do external threats unite or divide? Security crises, rivalries, and polarization in American foreign policy. International Organization 75(4):921–958.
- New York Times. 2016. Transcript: Donald Trump's foreign policy speech. <https://www.nytimes.com/2016/04/28/us/politics/transcript-trump-foreign-policy.html>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.

- O'Brian, Connor. 2019. House condemns Trump's Syria withdrawal. Politico. <https://www.politico.com/news/2019/10/16/house-condemns-trumps-syria-pull-out-000286>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Olsen, Gorm R. 2021. Donald Trump and "America first": the road ahead is open. International Politics 58(1):71–89.
- Ostermann, Falk, and Wolfgang Wagner. 2023. Introducing the parliamentary deployment votes database. Journal of Peace Research <https://doi.org/10.1177/00223433221116655>.
- Peake, Jeffrey S. 2023. Dysfunctional diplomacy: the politics of international agreements in an era of partisan polarization. New York: Routledge.
- Peterson, Paul E. 1994. The president's dominance in foreign policy making. Political Science Quarterly 109(2):215–234.
- Poplin, Cody M. 2015. President Obama's NDAA signing statement on Guantanamo. Lawfare Blog. <https://www.lawfareblog.com/president-obamas-ndaa-signing-statement-guantanamo>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Prins, Brandon C., and Bryan W. Marshall. 2001. Congressional support of the president: a comparison of foreign, defense, and domestic policy decision making during and after the cold war. Presidential Studies Quarterly 31(4):660–678.
- Regilme, Salvador S. 2022. United States foreign aid and multilateralism under the Trump presidency. New Global Studies <https://doi.org/10.1515/ngs-2021-0030>.
- Richter, Wolfgang. 2020. Attack on the open skies treaty. SWP comment. https://www.swp-berlin.org/fileadmin/contents/products/comments/2020C29_OpenSkies.pdf. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Rollcall. 2020. CQ roll call's key votes in 2019. <https://rollcall.com/2020/01/28/cq-roll-calls-key-votes-in-2019/>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Rubio, Marco. 2014. Rubio introduces bill addressing Russian arms control violations. <https://www.rubio.senate.gov/public/index.cfm/press-releases?ID=ca02e3f5-fca2-45fb-ac6b-30b5b646ae58>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Saldinger, Adva. 2017. Senators promise rewrite of Trump's foreign aid budget in hearings. Devox. <https://www.devox.com/news/senators-promise-rewrite-of-trump-s-foreign-aid-budget-in-hearings-90480>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Schreyer, Söhnke, and Jürgen Wilzewski. 2015. Congress Report. Entscheidungen und Entscheidungsprozesse der Legislative der Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika, No. 9–10/2015. https://www.sowi.uni-kl.de/fileadmin/powi/pdfs/cr_2015/Congress_Report_Endfassung_09-10_2015.pdf. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Schultz, Kenneth A. 2017. Perils of polarization in US foreign policy. The Washington Quarterly 40(4):7–28.
- Scott, James M., and Ralph G. Carter. 2002. Acting on the hill: congressional assertiveness in U.S. Foreign policy. Congress & the Presidency 29(2):151–169.
- Sirakov, David. 2020. Polarisierung: Ursachen und Konsequenzen. In Handbuch Politik USA Lammert, ed. Christian Lammert, Markus Siewert, and Boris Vormann, 365–385. Wiesbaden: VS.
- Smeltz, Dina, and Jordan Tama. 2021. Did Trump remake the GOP? On foreign policy, not so much. Politico. <https://www.politico.com/news/magazine/2021/05/27/trump-gop-foreign-policy-polling-490768>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Sonnicksen, Jared. 2022. Tensions of American federal democracy. Fragmentation of the state. London: Routledge.
- Tama, J. 2018. The multiple forms of bipartisanship: political alignments in US foreign policy. Social science research council's democracy papers series. <https://items.ssrc.org/democracy-papers/the-multiple-forms-of-bipartisanship-political-alignments-in-us-foreign-policy/>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Tama, Jordan. 2020. Forcing the President's hand: How the US congress shapes foreign policy through sanctions legislation. Foreign Policy Analysis 16(3):397–416.
- Tama, Jordan. 2021. Anti-presidential bipartisanship in foreign policy in the trump era. In Congress and foreign policy: activism, assertiveness, and acquiescence in a polarized era, ed. Ralph G. Carter, James M. Scott, 21–36. Lanham: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Theriault, Sean M. 2008. Party polarization in congress. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Toosi, Nahal. 2018. Lawmakers promise bipartisan 'no' to Trump plan for cutting diplomacy and aid money. Politico. <https://www.politico.com/story/2018/02/12/trump-budget-diplomacy-foreign-aid-405929>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Toosi, Nahal, Nancy Cook, and Bryan Bender. 2019. Trump makes it official: U.S. to quit missile treaty with Russia. Politico. <https://www.politico.com/story/2019/02/01/trump-inf-treaty-russia-1141617>. Accessed 12 Apr 2023.

- Trubowitz, Peter, and Peter Harris. 2019. The end of the American century? Slow erosion of the domestic sources of usable power. International Affairs 95(3):619–639.
- Trubowitz, Peter, and Nicole Mellow. 2011. Foreign policy, bipartisanship and the paradox of post-September 11 America. International Politics 48(2/3):164–187.
- Trump Twitter archive. 2022. Version 2. <https://www.thetrumparchive.com/?searchbox=%22iran+deal%22&results=1>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Trump White House. 2018. President Donald J. Trump’s State of the Union Address. <https://trumpwhitehouse.archives.gov/briefings-statements/president-donald-j-trumps-state-union-address/>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- US Global Leadership Coalition. 2017. Letter to Ryan, McConnell, Pelosi, and Schumer. http://www.usglc.org/downloads/2017/02/FY18_International_Affairs_Budget_House_Senate.pdf. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- USAID. 2022. Data services. <https://www.foreignassistance.gov/>. Accessed 1 Feb 2023.
- Villalobos, José D., and Cigdem V. Sirin. 2012. Agenda setting from the oval office: an experimental examination of presidential influence over the public agenda. International Journal of Public Opinion Research 24(1):21–41.
- Wagner, Wolfgang. 2020. The democratic politics of military interventions: political parties’, contestation, and decisions to use force abroad. Oxford: Oxford University Press.